

Class Participation Rubric (Zahr Said, University of Washington Law School)

Participation Evaluation Rubric

- The average student attends class and receives credit for doing so
- The conscientious student attends class with materials in hand, and speaks up, thoughtfully, at least once; does not appear preoccupied by distracting non-course content, whether on laptop or phone or elsewhere
- The excellent student does the same as the conscientious student, but also respectfully listens to colleagues and can situate views in relationship to earlier points in the conversation from that class, when appropriate
- The exceptional student does the same as the excellent student, and can also draw connections between class conversation and prior class sessions or readings, even from other points in the quarter
